Missionary's Aid Costs This Man Wallet and $18

LAWRENCE, MASS. — As 74-year-old Israel Ouellette of Methuen walked along the street here, an automobile drew alongside him and a sweet-faced, white-haired woman stepped out.

She identified herself as a missionary and said if he weren't feeling well, perhaps she could help with a blessing.

"Could feel better — a little stiff and lame today." Ouellette acknowledged. Whereupon his benefactress placed her hands on him and performed her little rite which, he later discovered, included lifting his wallet with $18.

SPANISH WORDS ABOUND IN WESTERN SPEECH

The picturesque language of the American cow country is made colorful by loan words of Mexican-Spanish origin. This is easy to understand when one considers the vast distance of the serpentine border which stretches from Brownsville, Tex., westward to Tia Juana. It was here, on the hot plains where two races touch and mingle, that the world's greatest cattle industry developed, and where a new element was added to the Anglo-Saxon-Norman-French dialect which we call "English."

New words were needed in those early frontier days. And, as has always been the case, our language enriched itself by borrowing from another tongue.

The cowman's lasso, which Easterners erroneously call a "la-SOO" (correct: LASS-oh) is an American spelling of the Spanish lazo (LAHSSoh), "a bow, loop, snare." The lasso is often called a lariat. This, too, is a corruption of la reata (lah ray-AH-tah), "the rope, especially for tying horses."

The cowpuncher's leather chaps, which protect his legs from the thorns and spines of western undergrowth, is a shortened form of chaparejos (SHAH-pah-RAY'hoess). The American word ranch is from the Spanish rancho, the original meaning of which was, "a mess; mess room; a hut; a camp for herdsmen." Bronco, also broncho, is from the Spanish bronco, "rough, coarse, wild."

The cowboy's piebald pony is referred to as a pinto which is Spanish for "painted." Frequently, however, a pinto horse is referred to as a "paint." The beautiful horse known as the palomino bears a name which means literally, "young pigeon."

Cowboys sometimes are spoken of as buckaroos. This is a corruption of the American Spanish vaquero (vah-KAY-roe), "a cowboy or herdsman," from vaca, "a cow."

The word dobe (DOE-bee) is short for adobe (ah-DOE-bay), "unburnt, sun-dried bricks," from adobar, "to dress, prepare, plaster."

EVERYBODY'S DOING IT!

Unless you want to look as limp as an old corn flake and twice as soggy, you'll latch onto these new fashion details that will be making grade in school any day now.

Neckline Bows—A little black bow at the neckline of your dickey shows you're no lickey.

You wear them on your blouses, too.

Sweater Scarfs—You're knotting small square scarfs around your neck, cowboy fashion, with your classic sweaters. Or you pull the ends through a friendship ring, instead of making a knot.

Belts, and More Belts—You're collecting 'em, the way you used to collect lapel pins. You wear them with tuck-in sweaters and shirts.

Transparent Saddles—You like to paste HIS picture inside to show through the transparent saddles. No wonder you're walking on air!

Stick Barrettes — Everybody's looking for new ideas in these hair gadgets. Newest is the metal with "stick" that's made to look like a miniature dagger with a jewel in the top.

Big Enough to Satisfy Any Fisherman

Answer to a fisherman's prayer is this 342-pound sea bass, hanging in front of a fish market in Los Angeles. The giant fish was hooked with line and tackle two miles off San Pedro, and brought to gaff in 40 minutes of struggle. Adding to the joy of Bruce Bethen, the mighty angler, was the fact that the bass was sold for 14 cents a pound.
